

If You Are the One and SBS: The cultural economy of difference

Journal:	Media International Australia
Manuscript ID	MIA-19-0078.R1
Manuscript Type:	Original Article
Keywords:	Chinese dating shows, cultural economy of difference, public service broadcasting, SBS, global TV format, Australian media industry, If You Are the One
Abstract:	If You Are the One (IYATO) is China's most popular television dating show. Since Australia's Special Broadcasting Service (SBS) bought it six years ago, the show has attracted a cult following among English-speaking viewers. SBS subsequently purchased several other Chinese reality shows, and the Seven Network launched its own version of IYATO. But none of these programs have proven to be as enduringly popular as IYATO. Taking an industry studies approach, this paper draws on the inside knowledge of one of the authors, and on interviews with several other SBS employees, to shed light on the media industry's thinking behind importing cultural products from China, particularly against the backdrop of fear and anxiety about China's influence. We also ask why IYATO has endeared itself to Australia's English-speaking viewers in ways that the majority of Chinese media content has not – despite the Chinese government's myriad soft power initiatives.

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

If You Are the One* and SBS: The cultural economy of difference

Abstract

If You Are the One (IYATO) is China’s most popular television dating show. Since Australia’s Special Broadcasting Service (SBS) bought it six years ago, the show has attracted a cult following among English-speaking viewers. SBS subsequently purchased several other Chinese reality shows, and the Seven Network launched its own version of IYATO. But none of these programs have proven to be as enduringly popular as IYATO. Taking an industry studies approach, this paper draws on the inside knowledge of one of the authors, and on interviews with several other SBS employees, to shed light on the media industry’s thinking behind importing cultural products from China, particularly against the backdrop of fear and anxiety about China’s influence. We also ask why IYATO has endeared itself to Australia’s English-speaking viewers in ways that the majority of Chinese media content has not – despite the Chinese government’s myriad soft power initiatives.

Introduction

Media content, forms and practices travel back and forth between Asia and Australia under a wide range of political-economic circumstances, are motivated by myriad social and cultural considerations, and exploit a proliferating number of platforms and pathways. While media entertainment products from China's cultural and creative industries have to some extent achieved flow across national borders (Keane, 2016), the decision to incorporate media content from the state media of the People's Republic of China into Australian television programming is a much more difficult and fraught process.

If You Are the One (IYATO), produced by provincial Chinese network Jiangsu Television, has been hailed as one of China's most enduringly successful television shows. For nearly a decade since its inception in January 2010, IYATO has maintained its status as one the highest rating variety shows in China (TVTV.HK, 2019). At one stage the program boasted some fifty million viewers globally (Wong, 2011). The Chinese title for IYATO is Fei cheng wu rao 非诚勿扰, which literally means 'Don't bother unless you are sincere'. A high-end studio production, each episode of the show is packed with spectacles of glamour, fashion and unmitigated entertainment. Based on a show called *Taken Out*¹ that began on Australia's Network Ten in 2008, IYATO initially featured a panel of twenty-four single young women and a series of four to five bachelors. Upon reviewing two to three video clips aimed at giving some information about the first male contestant, the women would take it in turns to quiz him, and had the option of turning off their light at any time if he failed to impress them. If the man survived two rounds of questioning, he would have the right to choose the woman he liked. If his chosen woman agreed to go on a date with him, the couple would receive a prize such as a return trip to the Aegean Sea. If she turned him down, he would go home empty-handed. But he could also decide to give up his right to choose a date.² The show is

1
2
3 fast-paced, its conversation brimming with jokes and repartee, and the bald-headed and 4
5 bespectacled host, Meng Fei, who has become a household name in China since he started
6
7 hosting IYATO in January 2010, is unfailingly humorous, personable and ready with witty
8
9 remarks and insightful comments.³
10
11

12
13 In the six years since IYATO's debut in Australia in 2013, the program has been shown on 14
15 SBS Viceland (formerly SBS 2) and SBS On Demand on a daily schedule, with the current 16
17 series continuing into 2020. IYATO has become the best-known and longest-running dating 18
19 show on Australian television. According to SBS monthly rating reports, over the last six 20
21 years the show has been consistently among the top ten shows on SBS Viceland, and one of 22
23 the most watched shows on SBS On Demand. It has grown a considerable cult following 24
25 among English-speaking viewers, and continues to be one of the most popular reality shows
26
27 on SBS television and Australian television in general.
28
29
30
31

32
33 The fact that IYATO is a Chinese-language-only talk show without a storyline to follow, and 34
35 that access to it for English speakers relies entirely on reading subtitles – both of which facts
36
37 require a consistent effort – does not deter Australian audiences from following the show.
38
39

40 This demonstrates the appeal and success of the show in Australia. Yet, news about its 41
42 popularity in Australia has consistently been received in China with a mixture of surprise, 43
44 frustration and even embarrassment and disappointment. Despite the Chinese government's 45
46 concerted efforts to export cultural products as part of its 'going out' policy (Keane, 2019;
47
48 Keane and Wu, 2018), IYATO is not part of that initiative (Sun, 2018). In our conversations 49
50 with Chinese cultural elites such as academics and media practitioners, we have learned that 51
52 IYATO is considered to be shallow and vulgar, that it lacks taste, and that it does not represent 53
54 the best of Chinese culture, its traditions and its values. One discussion, entitled 'How should 55
56 we assess the popularity of IYATO on Australian television?' (Zhihu, 2018), which appeared 57
58
59
60

on Zhihu, one of China's largest online forums, reflects how some Chinese viewers are puzzled by the show's popularity in Australia. Some comments are dismissive of the show itself, calling the female contestants 'gold diggers' and the male contestants 'hired actors' and are critical of the taste of Australian viewers. Some viewers are bemused, even frustrated, that it is one of the few windows onto life in China that is open to Australian audiences. But most believe that this is testimony to China's soft power, even though China's policy makers and soft power think-tanks would never have entertained the possibility that a dating show such as IYATO could be of any use in lifting China's international image and promoting Chinese culture.

The Chinese government has spent around six billion dollars attempting to boost its soft power agenda, including doing whatever it takes to ensure that its media content 'goes global' (Shambaugh, 2013). However, the rest of the world, especially Western countries, mostly finds the content of Chinese media boring, hollow and propagandistic (Sun, 2010, 2018). Despite its popularity in China, IYATO would not by any means be deemed remotely suitable for export by China's propaganda authorities. Indeed, in October 2011, the State Administration of Radio, Film and Television (SARFT) issued a set of directives that aimed to 'clean up the screen', and a year after its spectacular debut, IYATO became a victim of its own success. It soon became clear that, having captured the imagination of national audiences with provocatively blunt, even brutal, remarks from some of its contestants, IYATO had incurred the displeasure of the Chinese government (Bai, 2014). For instance, Ma Nuo, the contestant widely known as the woman who would rather 'cry in a BMW than smile on a bicycle', grew to become the trademark of the show. SARFT criticised the program for blatantly promoting materialistic and selfish values, and demanded that the show either lift its moral standards or risk being suspended. In the eyes of the government, IYATO had failed to fulfil the mission of all entertainment media in China: to 'provide moral education in the form of entertainment'. Succumbing to this pressure, and in the hope of appeasing the government, the show went through a few cosmetic changes, including adding the trusted social psychologist and academic from the Jiangsu Communist Party School, Huang Han, as a regular guest in 2011.

That said, it has to be noted that even though IYATO is subject to the regulatory framework of the Chinese media authorities, it is not produced with the intention – and certainly not charged with the task – of doing propaganda work that primarily aims to promote the Communist Party's legitimacy and its officially endorsed outlook on life and the world, and its values (People's Daily, 2016). A sizable body of scholarly research has been produced with the aim of understanding IYATO as a Chinese cultural phenomenon, its social impact in China, and the political economy of its production and consumption.⁴ But so far there has been no sustained attempt to understand its transnational appeal. We are therefore still not clear about what institutional factors and strategic decisions on the part of SBS have enabled the phenomenal success of IYATO in Australia. Nor do we know why this Chinese dating show endears itself to Australia's English-speaking viewers in ways that the majority of Chinese media products, including other entertainment programs, do not. Does SBS's success with the show embody an alternative – and more productive – way of engaging with China, rather than the avoidance approach currently advocated in the China influence narrative?

Aiming to address these questions, our paper takes a predominantly cultural-economy approach, which treats television both 'as a series of national industries and apparatuses' and as 'an inherently transnational form' whose content, talent, genres and ideas flow across national borders (Lewis et al., 2016: 20). This case study focuses on SBS's importation of an entertainment program from China, with the main objective of identifying the possible challenges and opportunities facing Australia's media industries in their efforts to serve the

1
2
3 cultural needs of the growing number of Chinese-speaking migrants in Australia, while at the 4
5 same time also bringing to mainstream English-speaking viewers a rare and very welcome
6
7 facet of China's fast-changing society. Our primary empirical data come from in-depth
8
9 interviews with SBS channel managers, programmers and subtitle editors who are involved in 10
11 bringing this Chinese dating show to SBS.⁵ In addition, one of the authors of this paper has 12
13 until recently Head of SBS's Subtitling Department, and she serves as the leading subtitler of 14
15 IYATO. Our discussion also incorporates her direct experience of translating the show's 16
17 content.
18
19
20

21
22 Through the prism of the experiences of these individuals at SBS and our conversations with 23
24 them, we aim not just to deal with the way in which a cultural artefact such as IYATO is 25
26 brought to Australian audiences, but also to unravel the institutional culture and processes
27
28 that have produced that artefact. Thus, we approach the statements of these industry people
29
30 not as a series of self-evident stories accounting for SBS's success with IYATO, but rather as 31
32 different narratives about SBS, the phenomenon of cultural production, audiences, 33
34 multiculturalism and innovation. Here, taking our cue from 'culture of production' 35
36 researchers such as du Gay et al. (1997), we argue that in understanding the processes
37
38 involved in bringing IYATO to Australian audiences, we need to consider not only the 39
40 occupational roles, job titles and professional activities of key people within SBS, but also –
41
42 and more importantly – how SBS's 'culture of production' informs its intra-organisational 43
44 decisions and activities, and how these decisions and activities in turn embody the values, 45
46 ethos and beliefs that have come to be associated with SBS.
47
48
49
50
51

52
53 Insights from two areas of research provide useful context for this discussion. One area
54
55 concerns itself with the value and viability of public service media. In recent decades, due to 56
57 the entrenchment of a neoliberal logic in most countries in the global West, public service
58
59
60

media have been confronted with increasingly conflicted imperatives. On the one hand, they are first and foremost public cultural institutions whose core mission it is to provide universally accessible content of social value that is not otherwise being delivered by the commercial media sector. On the other hand, increasingly, public service media have had to heed the bottom line. In response to this dual imperative, these organisations have needed to identify ways of generating content that has both social and economic value (Lowe and Martin, 2014). The Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) responded to this challenge by expanding its role as a public service broadcaster to become a public service media organisation, incorporating digital platforms so as to engage with audiences via multiple platforms and modes of delivery (Hutchinson, 2014).

Over the last decade or so, SBS, another public service broadcaster in Australia, has also had to operate according to the logic of this dual imperative. On the one hand, it needs to deliver content that is popular and has high entertainment value, and will therefore rate well; on the other hand, it also needs to fulfil its mission of increasing public awareness of cultural diversity and promoting understanding and acceptance of cultural, linguistic and ethnic diversity. The perceived key to delivering these dual and sometimes conflicting imperatives is to use innovative forms of expression to exploit Australia's diverse creative resources (Australian Government, 1991: part 2, section 6). Thus, as SBS's ethno-multiculturalism has evolved to become a mainstream version of cosmopolitan and popular multiculturalism, the notion of difference has been identified as a key resource for innovation (Ang, Hawkins and Dabboussy, 2008: 19–20). SBS's strategies vis-à-vis IYATO must be understood against this backdrop.

The other key area of research here is concerned with the production and transnational circulation of reality TV, especially the cultural economy of localising global TV franchises.

Starting in the 1980s and 1990s, a dramatic shift in the television industries to a reregulated, multichannel environment led to inexpensive programming that could potentially flow across different markets (Moran, 1998; Ellis, 2000; Bonner, 2003). These decades also saw the opening of East Asian TV markets and the global flow of their programs (White, 2005; Keane, Fung and Moran, 2007; Moran and Keane, 2003). Scholars began to investigate why some programs become successful despite the inherent cultural differences between shows and local audiences, and how genres travel across national borders (Bielby and Harrington 2008). We learn through an analysis of Bachelor/rette, for instance, that Australian audiences prefer a somewhat different way of declaring love to American audiences, despite sharing a common romantic vocabulary – hence the need to ‘glocalize’ the script (McAlister 2018). Some argue that the key to success lies in the balancing act between knowing how to make programs that have global appeal and knowing what the local customs are (Moran 2010). Similarly, Fung (2015) points to the need for a complex and often long process of cultural adaptation, as well as the localisation of knowledge in different locales and various cultural and social contexts. Drawing on these perspectives, this paper explores how SBS fruitfully exploits and negotiates the tension between the global and the local.

IYATO*, SBS and the cultural economy of multiculturalism

SBS, one of the five free-to-air networks in Australia, is a national, hybrid-funded commercial and public broadcasting network. To understand the reasons behind the success of IYATO on SBS, it is important to understand that the network’s management has had to take into account a range of imperatives, including the need to maintain gender equity in addressing the audience’s needs, to capitalise on the audience’s familiarity with certain genres, to ensure that the translation and subtitling process adds to rather than detracts from the program’s value, as well as to harness social media in effectively promoting the show.

Established in January 1978 initially as a radio-only broadcaster, SBS added television to its services in April 1979 (SBS, 2019). The SBS Charter stipulates the goal of providing ‘multilingual and multicultural radio, television and digital media services that inform, educate and entertain all Australians and, in doing so, reflect Australia’s multicultural society’ (Australian Government, 1991: part 2 section 6). Thanks to SBS’s offerings, Mandarin speakers in Australia can access daily news and current affairs from China, both on SBS TV (6:30am–7:00am) and on SBS Mandarin Radio (7:00am–9:00am). In addition to these programs, SBS recently launched a 24-hour, free-to-air, high-definition World Movie channel, where audiences can also access Chinese-language films.

Some of SBS’s other initiatives aiming to cater to the Chinese-speaking population, however, have not succeeded. For instance, in 2013, the network simultaneously launched an online Virtual Community Centre for Chinese Australians, and a locally produced Mandarin TV news service. Designed to broadcast once a week and featuring locally produced Mandarin news with both English and Chinese subtitles, both initiatives lasted for just ten months before folding due to low ratings and high production costs.

Although ratings have become increasingly important to SBS, unlike fully commercial channels and media companies in Australia – which are driven primarily by ratings – SBS has an original mandate to ensure equity and access to Australian listeners and viewers from Languages Other Than English (LOTE) backgrounds (Australian Government, 1991: part 2 section 6). At the same time, in an era of an increasingly neoliberal economic order and declining government funding, SBS, like other publicly funded media organisations in Australia, has needed to explore innovative ways of turning notions of multiculturalism, diversity and difference into marketable attributes (Sun et al., 2011). As far back as 2003, then Prime Minister John Howard reframed Australia’s multicultural policy by replacing the term ‘cultural diversity’ with ‘productive diversity’, thereby emphasising the economic usefulness of diversity and the importance of the pragmatic use of cultural diversity as a resource for economic growth (Commonwealth of Australia, 2003).

Since the earliest stages of its development, SBS’s LOTE programming has been dominated by European-language content, being primarily driven by audiences who migrated from Europe. Our interviews with key people who were directly involved in the decision to acquire, schedule and promote IYATO make it clear that the introduction of IYATO to SBS audiences in 2013 came at a moment when SBS was becoming keenly aware of the need to grow a younger audience (i.e., less than 40 years old), largely through popular entertainment programs. This was evidenced in the relaunch of SBS 2, later rebranded as SBS Viceland, as a younger audience channel. It was the view of Ben Nguyen, SBS 2’s channel manager, and his colleagues that, in order to balance the network’s largely European-language content and respond to the growing number of migrants from Asian countries, SBS needed more popular entertainment programs from these countries. On the lookout for new possibilities, Nguyen, who was tasked with programming for the newly relaunched channel, came across a story in an international media outlet about the controversy surrounding IYATO and its huge popularity, not just within China but also in the Chinese diaspora in Australia and around the world (Sun, 2018). Also, realising that there was an Australian connection – the format of IYATO was originally based on Network Ten’s Taken Out – he approached Jiangsu Television with a proposal to purchase initially thirteen episodes as Series 1.

Jiangsu Television was happy to sell the show, and decided to sell the earlier episodes starting in 2010, after SAFRT’s clean-up of the series, instead of the most recent episodes broadcast in 2013. This was Jiangsu Television’s decision, rather than a deliberate choice by SBS. Yet, in retrospect, it turned out to be hugely beneficial to SBS when its efforts to grow the popularity of the show paid off, and SBS could then continue purchasing episodes of the show in the order of their original production. As will be discussed later in this paper, IYATO endeared itself to Australian audiences for its brutal honesty, its authenticity, and its uncensored representation of China's social reality. Nguyen told us that the show continued to be popular after the 2010 clean-up, both in China and abroad, and its initial success in Australia paved the way for the growth of a sustained and regular fan base who quickly settled into the habit of viewing the show religiously, often as a ritual of gathering around the television with friends and family.

It is important to note that, to date, Australia is the only country in the world that has imported IYATO and broadcast it with English subtitles, thereby ensuring its continuing popularity among mainstream English-speaking viewers. When asked to explain Australia's unique success in this regard, SBS channel managers identified multiple factors, but primarily attributed it to the distinctive nature of SBS. SBS Viceland's channel manager John Boehm, who is responsible for making the decision to continue buying the show, believes that SBS is globally unique among media organisations:

Frankly, it probably just comes down to the fact [that] a lot of television is risk-averse. SBS is unique in that we are partially government funded. TV stations cannot take big risks. They can't risk airing a Chinese show on prime time. No other channels would have that done in Australia because they would have lost money if they hadn't rated well. But SBS is here. It has a Charter about promoting multiculturalism. That is why we can take risks. And we can take risks. That's why we are here. Australia is very unique because we have SBS. (John Boehm, 2019, personal interview)

SBS management indeed took a risk in its initial decision to air the show. When the programming team was asked to provide an estimation of the potential audience size, it was

1
2
3 predicted to be around only 4,000. But the decision to run the show went ahead as scheduled
4
5 and, as it turned out, the show's initial ratings indicated that as many as 30,000 people were 6
7 watching on the first night. And risk-taking was associated not only with the initial decision
8
9 to import the show but also with the scheduling of the program. As Nguyen told us, based on 10
11 the success of Series 1, the network took the bold decision to repeat the series whilst also 12
13 screening Series 2, which eventually led to the scheduling pattern of showing two new 14
15 episodes on weekend evenings, and then repeats each night for the rest of the week – a rare
16
17 scheduling pattern in television. This decision turned out to be crucial to the long-term 18
19 success of the show, as the seven-day coverage kept capturing viewers at different times and 20
21 places.
22
23
24
25

26
27 If there was a risk associated with running the show, it was a calculated risk. And there were 28
29 other aspects of IYATO that decision-makers believed would make that risk worthwhile.
30
31 Boehm told us that many of the entertainment programs aimed at younger audiences had a 32
33 predominantly male audience base; therefore, a dating show, whose audience would usually 34
35 be two-thirds female, would to some extent have the desirable outcome of addressing this 36
37 gender imbalance.
38
39
40
41

42 There were also a few other things about IYATO that made this risk-taking safer. For instance, 43
44 unlike many European television dramas and Latin-American 'telenovelas' (soap operas), 45
46 which run for many episodes and require viewing continuity, dating shows such as IYATO do
47
48 not suffer too much from discontinuous or intermittent viewing; indeed, each episode can be 49
50 viewed as a stand-alone program. This makes it possible for many viewers to stumble on the 51
52 show and then become addicted to it. Furthermore, according to Boehm, Australian audiences
53
54 were already familiar with reality television as a genre, and the format, lighting and tropes
55
56 associated with the genre were thus 'easily understandable' to Australian audiences.
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Social media, together with strategic program scheduling, were effective in encouraging the 4
5 formation of a viewing habit on the part of audience members, as well as the ritual of family
6
7 or group viewing, both of which were crucial to the cultivation of a loyal fan base. SBS's
8
9 social media team took advantage of the emergence of Twitter and other social media 10
11 platforms such as Facebook to share audience responses, screen shots and funny remarks 12
13 online. Caleb James, former channel manager of SBS 2, attributed some of this success to the 14
15 fact that the screening of the show coincided with the emerging popularity of social media as 16
17 a platform or 'second screen' to discuss the show in real time whilst watching the show.
18
19 According to James, twitter connected viewers across Australia, allowing them to post 20
21 'sharable' screen shots from the show and creating an instant ripple effect, thereby allowing 22
23 the show to gain momentum in forming a solid fan base, as well as facilitating the ritual of 24
25 group viewing among family and friends. He also noted that the show presented itself as 26
27 conversational fodder among friends, colleagues and family members, contributing both to 28
29 habit formation on the part of the audience, and socialisation among them. Some of the 30
31 screen shots from the show became widely circulated memes, and many viewers formed a 32
33 rapport with a certain guest on the show, and made a point of following her journey in the 34
35 search for Mr. Right.
36
37
38
39
40
41
42

43 The greatest challenge SBS took on with IYATO was the decision to subtitle the show. Prior 44
45 to IYATO, SBS had not subtitled a reality show. Not only is a reality show like IYATO talk 46
47 intensive, but, more importantly, in terms of impediments to accessing the program's content,
48
49 there is no storyline or plot – as there is in a film or scripted drama series – to make the 50
51 viewing experience easier and get audiences hooked on the story. Typically IYATO is 52
53 subtitled from beginning to end, with only occasional gaps when contestants dance. To 54
55 follow the show, non-Chinese-speaking audiences virtually have to glue their eyes to the TV
56
57 screen all the time, and that is by no means a small ask. Quality subtitles that are intelligible
58
59
60

and relevant to Australian audiences and communicate the program's unique Chinese flavour and experiences have been essential to the accessibility and success of the show. The fact that the English subtitles convey host Meng Fei's humorous and witty banter so successfully to Australian viewers is testimony to the effectiveness of the translation. In the meantime, the fact that audiences consistently enjoy watching a heavily subtitled talk show demonstrates IYATO's exceptionally strong appeal. As Nguyen points out, while people relate to universal experiences of dating, love and relationships, the ultimate appeal of the show comes from what he calls a 'sense of cultural uniqueness' it brings to Australian audiences. This uniqueness or point of difference has a lot to do with the cognitive, cultural and linguistic processes that are mobilised when the two languages and cultures intersect, and this helps to explain why there is a gap between what Chinese viewers see – or miss – in the show, and what Australian viewers pick up – or what goes over their heads. For example, while living far apart is perfectly acceptable in a relationship in China, it is viewed as a primary obstacle to starting a relationship to many Australians. Also, while certain words that are used to comment negatively on another's appearance are regarded as normal and acceptable by many Chinese people, those words, once translated into English, are often seen as 'blunt' or 'brutally honest' by Australians. This is because making negative comments on another's appearance is commonly accepted in China, whereas Australians tend to refrain from making such comments.

IYATO has had to go through a cross-lingual and cross-cultural translation before it is brought to Australian audiences. Mismatches in cognitive environments between source and target language groups, together with missing contexts when transplanting the show from China to Australia, become inevitable, and require careful manoeuvring and skilled negotiation in the translation process. As the key subtitler of the show, one of us regularly has had to deal with such challenges. For example, we found that the word 'simple' 简单 in Chinese has the same

1
2
3 meaning when it is used to describe both a lifestyle and a person, but in English ‘a simple
4 lifestyle’ and ‘a simple person’ mean completely different things, with the latter having a
5 negative connotation. For another instance, in English the expression ‘spare tyre’ carries the 6 extended meaning of extra fat around one’s belly, while in Chinese it means ‘back-up
7 boyfriend/girlfriend’.
8
9

10
11
12
13
14
15
16 Often enough an expression is innocuous in Chinese but becomes laden with meaning when 17 translated into English. Things such as ‘long-distance relationship’, ‘living with one’s
18 parents-in-law’, ‘handing over your salary to your wife’, ‘carrying your girlfriend’s handbag
19 indicating your love for her’, or comments on someone’s appearance or personal 20 circumstances are normal in a Chinese context, and hence are taken for granted. But in an 21 Australian setting, these ‘normal’ expressions and practices become cultural elements that 22 inform Australian audiences about differences in Chinese life and society, of which they have 23 only limited knowledge. Similarly, social practices and behaviours that are revealed in the 24 show, such as widespread entrepreneurship, with virtually every contestant starting up her/his 25 own business; the prevalence of prenuptial agreements; attitudes towards gay relationships;
26 the unabashed embrace of materialism; buying frenzies, as seen in the 11 November
27 nationwide online sale; or even racist remarks – all of which are taken for granted by Chinese
28 viewers as aspects of their daily lives – are keenly picked up on by Australian viewers, who 29 then judge these practices and behaviours – for better or for worse – against their own
30 cultural background. A typical example is around the expression of love. When a male
31 contestant follows a girl he likes on the show, Chinese audiences view his obsessive
32 behaviour as evidence of his love, passion and sincerity, while such behaviour is immediately
33 perceived as stalking and creepy by Australian viewers. This sense of the cultural uniqueness 34 of the show partly comes from genuine cultural differences, such as filial piety, and partly 35 from perceptions grounded in an Australian cultural and cognitive setting. It seems that the 36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

English-subtitled version of the show has assumed a life of its own and has opened up new ways of seeing the original Chinese version. It is clear that the value-adding subtitling process, in addition to the host of strategies discussed here, has ensured the phenomenal success of the show on SBS.

Balancing sameness with difference

The reasons that account for the popularity of IYATO in China are also to some extent applicable when it comes to Australia. Both Chinese and international audiences appreciate the ‘brutal honesty’ of the contestants, which presents an unofficial, and even alternative, version of the China story. The contestants, who are ordinary young people from all walks of life, are encouraged to speak their minds on the show; Chinese and Australian audiences alike relate to their experiences and stories, and frequently share them via social media. The show deals in the universal and enduring themes of love and the search for intimacy, and all of our interviewees at SBS identified this as the ultimate factor that delivers the element of cultural familiarity, relatability and resonance. Furthermore, it is a high production value show, with a visuality that is ‘over the top’, the sound, glamour and spectacle so overwhelming that it feels like it may ‘break the television set’, in the words of Brenden Dannaher, a producer and subtitle editor who has been responsible for the post-production of the English version of the show. Besides, he adds, given that there are always 24 good-looking and glamorous young women and often a handsome young man, what’s not to like?

Was the initial decision to buy IYATO driven by the need to procure popular entertainment programs that would potentially rate well, or was it motivated more by the desire to introduce nourishing and rich cultural content from non-English-speaking countries to Australian audiences? Among our interviewees, the answer was without doubt the former. In this sense, SBS’s programming decisions do not seem to differ much from purely commercial television

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

networks. But what sets SBS apart from commercial stations is its strategy of bringing culture through entertainment. As Ben Nguyen said, ‘For a TV show to be successful, we need to have a large audience. In order to bring groups of different audience members to a show, entertainment value is the best way to achieve that’. To Nguyen, entertainment is the goal, but culture is the added value that comes with and through the entertainment, and in this sense, the dating show format is a ‘Trojan horse’ that smuggles cultural content in without the audience knowing that they are being offered some inside knowledge of Chinese culture and society in addition to pure entertainment. The Trojan horse strategy aims to attract young viewers who would normally watch entertainment programs on commercial channels, while also retaining the ‘rusted-on SBS viewers’. And judging by the popularity of the show, the strategy seems to have worked.

Our conversations with SBS managers, editors and subtitlers suggest that the appeal of IYATO to English-speaking Australian audiences stems from that ‘magical balance’ between familiarity and reliability, the notion of sameness, on the one hand, and the fascinating, entertaining, revealing and sometimes shocking and confronting element of difference, on the other. In Dannaher’s view, if it is the ‘sameness factor’ that gets the audience in the door’, it is the difference that explains its enduring appeal. As Caleb James remarked, many reality shows you see on local television can be quite parochial, but IYATO ‘opens a rare window onto Chinese life’, and in doing so, enables English-speaking audiences to learn something about a country that sends so many Chinese migrants to live in this country, some of whom are their neighbours, friends and colleagues. Given the growing importance of China to Australia’s economic prosperity, Nguyen notes, it stands to reason that SBS’s audience would be interested in content that ‘helps inform them about current social issues in China’. As Stephen Schafer, one of the subtitle editors of the show, says, ‘To non-Chinese viewers it presents issues related to dating, social conventions and values from another culture, and is

1
2
3 unlike most Western dating shows. So both sameness and surprise would be at work in this 4
5 case, depending on the audience segment'. For this reason, Schafer believes that the show
6
7 attracts a 'more-curious-than-average non-Chinese viewer':
8
9

10
11 I'm sure that Australian's would also like to learn more about the politics, culture and 12
13 society of one of Australia's most important trading partners and a dominant political 14
15 force in the region. But twentieth- and twenty-first-century Chinese history and current 16
17 affairs are fraught with political difficulties, so Chinese programs about these subjects 18
19 could be regarded as problematic or propagandistic. Most of what we do see, made by 20
21 Westerners, does seem to skirt most of the real tough issues.
22
23
24

25
26 At first, I guess IYATO was a novelty. Even though it has settled in to a long-standing 27
28 regular spot, I think something of that novelty may persist, but perhaps it now serves 29
30 more as a window into the lives of people like the Chinese students, Chinese workers,
31
32 Chinese families who are much more in evidence in society these days than they were 33
34 even a decade ago. (Stephen Schafer, personal interview)
35
36
37

38
39 Brenden Dannaher also confesses that as a viewer, he personally has learned a lot from the 40
41 show. Prior to working on IYATO as a post-production editor, his understanding of China 42
43 came mainly from three sources: the theories of socialism and communism that he learned at 44
45 high school, some old films about China, and coverage of China in news and current affairs.
46
47 He thought that the first two sources were dated and the third was a largely negative portrayal
48
49 of China, because 'bad news travels fast'. IYATO has enabled him to see what China is like 50
51 after a few decades of rapid social change. Besides, he has learned about the significance of 52
53 filial piety in Chinese culture, as well as the impact of China's one-child policy.
54
55
56

57
58 In 2015, as part of a promotional initiative, SBS aired a documentary entitled Nineteen
59
60 Reasons to Love IYATO, in which local personalities in the media and show business – all

1
2
3 fans of IYATO – were invited to nominate their own reasons for liking the show. The 4
5 responses were exceptionally diverse, and provided clues to why viewers from other cultures
6
7 and nations also like the show. Forum guests described the program as ‘addictive’ and ‘like 8
9 an episode of The Hunger Games’; they liked its ‘sheer honesty’, because it reveals both the 10
11 ‘brutal side of love’ and ‘all the awkwardness of a first date’. Many singled out the show’s 12
13 host Meng Fei, describing him as a ‘humorous host full of wisdom’ and expressing 14
15 appreciation of his relationship tips. In response to our interview questions, Schafer echoed 16
17 these sentiments, but described the situation in a most imaginative manner: ‘As a competition
18
19 it has a sporting aspect to it, things are at stake, there are winners and losers’. To Schafer, ‘the 20
21 big set and large audience create a grand scene, like a sports match, pop concert or politically 22
23 rally, perhaps. It’s an arena, like the Colosseum, where girls and contestants are like 24
25 gladiators’.

26
27
28 An effective policy for attracting and growing the audience is to ‘get the audience in the door
29
30 first’ through entertainment by carefully negotiating difference (novelty) and sameness
31
32 (familiarity). and then smuggle in a regular dose of cultural knowledge through the back door.
33
34 But this policy can only work if viewers are not aware that they are being taught a class in 35
36 cross-cultural literacy while they are watching the show. In Dannaher’s words, anything
37
38 worth teaching has to be learned voluntarily by viewers, not taught by the show. ‘You have to 39
40 want to learn the info yourself, through lots of raw information, from authentic people who 41
42 speak naturally’. In the current era of neoliberal cultural economy, cosmopolitan 43
44 multiculturalism has to a large extent depended on the strategy of popular multiculturalism as 45
46 a prerequisite. On a regular basis, Dannaher has to decide what to leave in and what to edit
47
48 out so as to shorten the show to fit within SBS’s time slots, and in doing so, he can weed out
49
50 the potentially boring parts of each episode. To him, the appeal of the show comes from the 51
52 fact that ‘Chinese culture is exposed, not lectured on’. Adept at choosing potentially sharable
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 screen shots, he always tries to pick those that are still funny when taken out of context, those 4
5 that can give viewers a different slant on the program. One of his screen shots featured a 6
7 female contestant asking the male contestant, a butcher, ‘What do you slaughter? Is it pigs,
8
9 ducks or chickens?’
10
11

12
13 It is clear that the great majority of Chinese television content fails to be chosen for broadcast 14
15 either because it is not entertaining enough or because it has not figured out how to tell 16
17 stories in a way that is entertaining enough to foreign viewers. Ben Nguyen told us that SBS
18
19 had looked at some drama series from China. These programs clearly want to express some 20
21 vision of Chinese identity or reinforce certain national mythologies, and are using content to 22
23 try and advance those aims. However, if these intentions are too transparent, Nguyen said, 24
25 these programs would be considered to lack appeal for Australian audiences.
26
27
28

29
30 In the hope of capitalising on the success of IYATO, SBS has subsequently purchased a 31
32 number of other Chinese television shows in the reality television genre, including twelve
33
34 episodes of each of these shows: a parenting show called Where Are We Going, Dad? 爸爸去哪儿;
35
36 The Brain 最强大脑; the highly popular Chinese dating show Meet the Parents 中国式
37
38 相亲 featuring transgender host Jin Xin; and Dating with Parents 新相亲时代 (also hosted 39
40 by Meng Fei). But none of them have rated as well as IYATO. Ben Nguyen attributed China’s 41
42 lack of success in exporting television shows to its lack of capacity to tell globally resonant
43
44 stories. ‘Different countries have different levels of maturity when it comes to producing 45
46 cultural and media exports. For instance, Korea and Turkey are big exporters. China needs to 47
48 catch up and figure out how to produce shows that will sell internationally’.
49
50
51
52
53

54
55 In other words, SBS is keenly aware of the under-representation of Chinese-language
56
57 programs on the network, given China’s growing importance to Australia in social, economic 58
59 and political terms, and given that as many as four percent of Australians currently speak 60

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Chinese at home. As John Boehm says, ‘We regularly assess new Chinese factual/scripted/entertainment series and also investigate recommendations that come to us from audiences/communities. Engaging Chinese-speaking viewers with other [English-language] content is also a strategy, with options like The Handmaid’s Tale being made available with Chinese subtitles’. Ben Nguyen says it is their goal to pursue more content from big language groups, and he believes that ‘it’s potentially a growth area for SBS On Demand’.

The cultural economy of difference

Our discussion has focused primarily on SBS as a cultural institution, and its institutional culture of production. No doubt future research may benefit from a more systematic study of the viewers and fans of IYATO. Our interviews at SBS – and this is also confirmed by one of the authors who worked there – suggest that, with the exception of a regular slot for China Central Television’s news as part of SBS’s multi-lingual news service, Australian media organisations do not generally choose to import media and cultural content from China’s official media, and what does get selected for import from China is deemed to be free from government propaganda or, in some cases, is labelled as either critical of the Chinese regime or banned. This default avoidance approach stems from fear and anxiety about a perceived threat to Australia’s democracy and press freedom if Chinese government propaganda and its underlying communist ideology were to be allowed to become part of Australia’s media landscape. Despite this concern, it is clear from our discussion that IYATO has also effectively presented itself as a window through which mainstream viewers outside China, such as those in Australia, can understand and even come to like China, or at least become more interested in Chinese society and culture. Furthermore, the show has gone some way towards correcting an image of the Chinese population and media production companies as

1
2
3 victims of a totalising censorship. IYATO's success in Australia embodies another irony that 4
5 so far has eluded public commentators in this country. Due to growing fear and anxiety about 6
7 China's influence in Australia in recent years, any attempt on the part of Australia's media,
8
9 publishing and other cultural industries to form a partnership with China is generally eyed 10
11 with suspicion and distrust (Wen, 2016; Burrows, 2018). Yet, despite its phenomenal and 12
13 unexpected success in Australia, no public commentators have cited this show as an example
14
15 of China's soft power, nor as evidence of Australia having come under growing Chinese 16
17 influence. In the words of one SBS channel manager, IYATO, because it is an entertainment 18
19 show, has flown under the radar amidst the often fractious debate about China's soft power, 20
21 even though, by offering a glimpse of Chinese society that is largely missing from the current 22
23 China narrative, the show can be seen to bring a much needed balance, even a healthy 24
25 antidote, to the China influence narrative. In this sense, even though the Chinese government
26
27 does not charge the program with the task of promoting an attractive China, IYATO has 28
29 nevertheless presented an aspect of contemporary Chinese society that is more convincing, 30
31 relatable and even somewhat endearing to many Western viewers. It has thus inadvertently 32
33 become a soft power asset, or, as Schafer puts it, IYATO 'is simply itself another instance of 34
35 the "China influence" in action', even though neither the Chinese government nor the China
36
37 influence pedlars in Australia care to acknowledge it.
38
39
40
41
42
43
44

45
46 In response to China's rise and Australia's economic dependence on China, Australia has 47
48 seen the gradual entrenchment of the China influence narrative in public discourse over the 49
50 past few years. Of course, the issue of China's influence in Australia is complex. But the 51
52 reason there is a heightened level of anxiety about that influence is simple. For the first time
53
54 in its history, Australia has had to deal closely with a world power – and its biggest trading
55
56 partner – that is not, as Hugh White puts it, 'Anglo-Saxon', that is not a liberal democracy, 57
58 and, in a nutshell, that is politically and ideologically different (Clark, 2018).
59
60

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

IYATO did not flow into the Australian media space because of digital connectivity. Nor did it land in the country as a result of the Chinese government’s globalising strategies. Rather, it arrived as a result of SBS’s deliberate strategy of importing popular culture content from China. But our discussion brings to light some key challenges and opportunities for SBS, and for Australia’s media sector in general, in attempting to import culturally diverse programs from overseas. To be sure, Meng Fei and IYATO were a godsend to SBS, in its quest for entertainment with a difference. However, apart from this happy alignment of intentions on both supply and demand sides, what accounts for SBS’s success with the show is a constellation of many factors, including managerial decisions, programming and promotional strategies, sound editorial judgement, and the translator’s in-depth cross-cultural sensitivity, knowledge and deft translation skills. In addition, one has to take into account the less tangible resources available to SBS, including the vision of its key decision-makers, the passion and enthusiasm of some individuals involved in the program’s English post-production, and even a general institutional attitude that supports and even nourishes innovation through risk-taking.

The political, cultural and economic imperatives facing SBS have evolved considerably since its inception, but it is the uniqueness of SBS as a public institution with a mandate to encourage cultural diversity and promote multiculturalism that ensures that it continues to be space where the notion of difference is celebrated. However, in this era of an increasingly entrenched neoliberal economic order and a shrinking space for cosmopolitan multiculturalism, SBS does face challenges in continuing to drive innovation and bring content ‘with a difference’ to Australian audiences.

References

- Ang I, Hawkins G and Dabboussy L (2008) The SBS story: The challenge of cultural diversity. Sydney: UNSW Press.
- Australian Government (1991) Charter of the SBS. In: Special Broadcasting Service Act 1991. Available at: <https://www.legislation.gov.au/Details/C2018C00086> (accessed 18 December 2019).
- Bai R (2014) 'Clean up the screen': Regulating television entertainment in the 2000s. In: Bai R and Song G eds. (2014) Chinese television in the twenty-first century: Entertaining the nation. Abingdon, UK: Routledge, pp. 69–86.
- Bai R and Song G eds. (2014) Chinese Television in the Twenty-First Century: Entertaining the Nation. Abingdon, UK: Routledge.
- Bielby D D and Harrington C L (2008) Global TV: Exporting television and culture in the world market. New York: New York University Press.
- Bonner F (2003) Ordinary television: Analyzing popular TV. London: Sage.
- Burrows I (2018) Australian Financial Review questioned over deal to share content with China's Caixin Global. ABC, 22 November. Available at: <https://www.abc.net.au/news/2018-10-12/australian-financial-review-caixin-sign-deal-to-share-content/10354938> (accessed 20 December 2019).
- Clark A (2018) Julie Bishop and the Australia-China relationship. Australian Financial Review, 17 May. Available at: <https://www.afr.com/news/policy/defence/julie-bishop-and-china-20180517-h1073y> (accessed 20 December 2019).

Commonwealth of Australia (2003) Multicultural Australia: United in diversity – updating the 1999 new agenda for multicultural Australia: Strategic directions for 2003–2006.

Canberra: Department of Communications, Information Technology and the Arts.

Available at: http://www.multiculturalaustralia.edu.au/doc/ma_1.pdf (accessed 18 December 2019).

du Gay P, Hall S, Janes L, Mackay H and Negus K (1997) Doing cultural studies: The story of the Sony Walkman. London: Sage.

Ellis J (2000) Seeing things: Television in the age of uncertainty. London: I.B. Tauris.

Fung A (2015) The globalization of TV formats. In: Oakley K and O'Connor J (eds) The Routledge companion to the cultural industries. London: Routledge, pp. 130–140.

Hutchinson J (2014) Extending the public service remit through ABC Pool. In: Lowe G F and Martin F (eds) The Value of Public Service Media. Göteborg, Sweden: Nordicom, pp. 223–244.

Keane M (2016) Disconnecting, connecting, and reconnecting: How Chinese television found its way out of the box. International Journal of Communication 10(2016): 5426–5443.

Keane M (2019) China's digital media industries and the challenge of overseas markets. Journal of Chinese Cinemas 13(3): 244–256.

Keane M, Fung Y H and Moran A (2007) New television, globalisation, and the East Asian cultural imagination. Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press.

Keane M and Wu H (2018) Lofty ambitions, new territories and turf battles: China's platforms 'go out'. Media Industries 5(1): 51–68.

- Lewis T, Martin F and Sun W (2016) Telemodernities: Television and transforming lives in Asia. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Lim M (2017) The new format of 'If You Are the One' finds a way to improve on perfection. Available at: <https://www.sbs.com.au/guide/article/2017/10/16/new-format-if-you-are-one-finds-way-improve-perfection> (accessed 17 December 2019).
- Lowe G F and Martin F (eds) (2014) The value of public service media. Göteborg, Sweden: Nordicom.
- Luo W and Sun Z (2014) Are you the one? China's TV dating shows and the Sheng Nü's predicament. Feminist Media Studies 15(2): 1–18.
- McAlister J (2018) What we talk about when we talk about love: Declarations of love in the American and Australian Bachelor/ette franchises. Continuum: Journal of Media & Cultural Studies 32(5): 643–656.
- Miao D, Liu W and Wu Z (2013) Morality and law: Ideas and pathways for improving Chinese media's capacity for international communication. Xiandai Chuanbo [Modern Communication] 1.
- Moran A (1998) Copycat television: Globalisation, program formats and cultural identity. Luton, UK: University of Luton Press.
- Moran A (2010) TV formats worldwide: Localizing global programs. Bristol, UK: Intellect Books.
- Moran A and Keane M (2003) Joining the circle. In: Keane M and Moran A (eds) Television across Asia: Formats, television industries and globalization. London: Routledge Curzon, pp. 197–204.

1
2
3 People's Daily (2016) Xi Jinping and his views on journalism and public opinion [Xi Jin

4
5 Ping de xinwen yulun guan 习近平的新闻舆论观]. Available at:

6
7
8 <https://outlook.office.com/mail/deeplink?version=2019120201.10&popoutv2=1>

9
10 (accessed 24 July 2019).

11
12
13 SBS (2019) About us. Available at: <https://www.sbs.com.au/aboutus/faqs> (accessed 18

14
15
16 December 2019).

17
18
19 Shambaugh D (2013) China goes global: The partial power. Oxford, UK: Oxford University 20
21 Press.

22
23
24 Sun W (2010) Mission impossible? Soft power, communication capacity, and the 25
26 globalization of Chinese media. International Journal of Communication 4(1): 19–26.

27
28
29 Sun W (2018) Soft power by accident or by design: If You Are the One and Chinese 30
31 television. In: Voci P and Hui L (eds) Screening China's soft power. Abingdon, UK:
32
33 Routledge, pp. 196–211.

34
35
36 Sun W, Yue A, Sinclair J and Gao J (2011) Diasporic Chinese media in Australia: A post-37
38 2008 overview. Continuum: Journal of Media and Cultural Studies 25(4): 515–527.

39
40
41 TVTV.HK (2019) Tag archives: If You Are the One. Available at:

42
43
44
45
46 http://www.tvtv.hk/archives/tag/%E9%9D%9E%E8%AF%9A%E5%8B%BF%E6%89%
47
48 B0 (accessed 17 December 2019).

49
50
51 Wang P (2016) Inventing traditions: Television dating shows in the People's Republic of 52
53 China. Media, Culture & Society. Available at:

54
55
56 <https://doi.org/10.1177/0163443716648493> (accessed 17 December 2019).

- 1
2
3 Wen, P (2016) China's propaganda arms push soft power in Australian media deals. Sydney
4
5 Morning Herald, 31 May. Available at:
6
7 https://www.smh.com.au/business/companies/chinas-propaganda-arms-push-soft-power-
8
9 in-australian-media-deals-20160531-gp7yz6.html (accessed 20 December 2019).
10
11
12
13 White J D (2005) Global media: The television revolution in Asia. New York: Routledge.
14
15
16 Wong E (2011) China TV grows racy, and gets a chaperon. New York Times, 31 December.
17
18 Available at: https://www.nytimes.com/2012/01/01/world/asia/censors-pull-reins-as-
19
20 china-tv-chasing-profit-gets-racy.html?pagewanted=all (accessed 17 December 2019).
21
22
23
24 Zavoretti R (2016) Is it better to cry in a BMW or to laugh on a bicycle? Marriage, 'financial 25
26 performance anxiety', and the production of class in Nanjing (People's Republic of 27
28 China). Modern Asian Studies 50(4): 1190–1219.
29
30
31
32 Zhihu (2018) How should we assess the popularity of IYATO on Australian television?
33
34 (online forum thread). Available at: <https://www.zhihu.com/question/268132072> 35
36 (accessed 25 July 2019).
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Endnotes

-
- ¹ IYATO is one of more than 30 shows globally that were modelled on Network Ten’s Taken Out. Coming full circle, The Seven Network’s Take Me Out was in turn inspired by the success of IYATO.
- ² The new format of the show, which started in 2017, is quite different. It starts with the male contestant allocating each woman either to his ‘favourite’ zone, or to a ‘maybe’ zone for observation. There are a number of other significant innovations (Lim, 2017). Australian viewers tend to prefer the old format.
- ³ Meng Fei started his career as a printing factory worker. By chance he became a cameraman in Jiangsu Television, and in 2002 showed his talent as a news presenter in a morning news program. He shot to fame after he started hosting IYATO. One of the authors of this paper has had a long-standing connection with Meng Fei, and much of the information about the host and IYATO draws on her first-hand knowledge.
- ⁴ For a selection of scholarly works that analyse IYATO, see Bai and Song (2014); Luo and Sun (2014); Wang (2016); Zavoretti (2016); Lewis et al. (2016); and Sun (2018).
- ⁵ The interviewees from SBS were Caleb James, former SBS 2 channel manager; John Boehm, SBS Viceland channel manager; Ben Nguyen, SBS channel manager; Brenden Dannaher, subtitle editor; and Stephen Schafer, subtitle editor. Interviews took place at SBS’s headquarters in Sydney on 1–3 July 2019.