

A response to 'failed state' narratives of PNG

by Kylie McKenna, Senala Morona and Cooniebhert Samgay · June 23, 2021

COVID-19 appears the latest instalment in outsider narratives of Papua New Guinea (PNG) as a 'failed', 'weak' or 'fragile' state. In April 2020, for example, with only eight cases of COVID-19 in the country at that time, Australian journalists capitalised on the opportunity to put PNG on the failed-state precipice. As PNG's COVID-19 cases grew, Sky News editors theatrically warned of a "stampede of people" to Queensland, and thoughts in Canberra turned to the potential for PNG to plunge into chaos. In this blog, we reflect on representations of PNG as a 'failed' or 'fragile' state, and call for greater reflexivity among those who use these terms. Rather than contribute to the debate as to whether PNG is \(or is not\) a fragile state, we draw attention to the cultural and political undertones of these labels.

Narratives evoking a sense of chaos in PNG, particularly by Australians, are not new. Prior to independence from Australia in 1975, commentators looked to the experience of post-colonial states internationally to point to the likelihood of political anarchy and economic collapse. Defying these negative expectations, analysts described PNG 25 years later as "one of the few post-colonial states that has maintained an unbroken record of democratic government, avoiding both an army takeover and an authoritarian civilian regime". Now in its 46th year of independence, the minimal Australian media coverage afforded to PNG continues to focus on dysfunction and insecurity.

The failed state concept is loosely defined and carries a myriad of nuances. Most definitions focus on political instability and limited capacity of government institutions to exact their purpose. Others use a range of risk indicators to measure state 'vulnerability', without actually defining what a failed state is.

The idea of state failure emerged in the early 1990s in an effort to understand state collapse in Somalia. But it gained wider prominence following the September 11 attacks, when it was used to explain why some poor countries were unable to facilitate economic growth. Although the focus of US policymakers was on the capacity of Afghanistan to combat al-Qaeda, the concept hooked into regional terrorist-related anxieties elsewhere. Australia's Howard government, for example, cautioned that failing states in the Pacific (especially the Solomon Islands and PNG) could pose a threat to national security. Howard argued that Australia's aid program should henceforth be conditional on recipient states providing stability and good governance.

In the case of PNG, the failed state narrative is accurate in so far as it draws attention to undeniable deficiencies in the country's formal government institutions. Our response to the term does not intend to dismiss the grim health, economic and political realities that PNG is currently facing. But it is well known that governance in PNG (and elsewhere) transcends the formal government apparatus. Non-state authorities (e.g. elders, chiefs, and religious and women's leaders) play an important governing role in PNG's predominantly rural communities. Those in remote areas might only interact with the liberal democratic state vis-à-vis false promises made during election time. The contributions that traditional institutions, and Melanesian and Christian values, make to positive peace in PNG are rendered invisible in fragile and failing storylines.

We also recognise that the failed state label is no longer exclusively applied to PNG by independent outside commentators. Former Prime Minister Peter O'Neill, for example, recently claimed that PNG is now in a position to be declared a failed state, an idea he previously refuted while in government. Now in opposition, O'Neill appears to be using the term as a rallying call to rescue the country's economy under the leadership of James Marape.

Yet the failed state narrative is perhaps more likely (and understandably) to be received by Papua New Guineans as criticism levelled from a former colonial authority. This is reflected in counterarguments that the roots of failure are external and historical, rather than stemming from domestic structural weaknesses. Indeed, the idea for this blog emerged out of a passionate discussion among PNG Studies and International Relations students at Divine Word University. As Senala Morona, one of the students and a co-author of this blog, wrote on the class internet forum:

The idea of a 'failed state' is coming from countries that have exploited the so-called failed state at some point for their own development. If our resources were used for our own development, maybe we wouldn't be failed states ... Maybe if their multinational companies heard our cries for our motherland and didn't exploit it and cause conflict among our peoples for years, maybe we wouldn't be labelled failed states. Maybe if we were seen as equals in the first place, we would have done better in our affairs and not struggle to be finally seen as equals and be heard as peoples and not labourers, housekeepers or carriers.

PNG is a relatively young nation state that has extraordinary challenges ahead. We too long for the elimination of structural violence in PNG, and a state system that supports our communities to realise their potentialities. But narratives of failure and weakness, well intentioned or not, are reminiscent of a colonial imaginary that evokes feelings of cultural inferiority among those whose state is deemed to be failing. Constant negative assessments can reinforce a sense of hopelessness, or 'negative nationalism', but they can also provoke a sense of resolve to share alternative histories (albeit with less power to have those histories heard). To illustrate this point, we conclude with the words of Senala Morona:

When they say PNG is a failed state, it stirs up a conflict within me that I know the only way I can have peace is to express that emotion in writing so that conflict within me is resolved.

Download PDF

Related posts:

- PNG's plummeting vaccination rates: now the lowest in the world?
- COVID-19 in Papua New Guinea and an imagined threat to Australia
- Fragile states need support to fight COVID-19
- Is PNG a fragile state?
- Beliefs and bureaucracy: Building state effectiveness in fragile contexts

#Colonisation #Papua New Guinea #PNG

Recent comments

- ◊ Negara Persatuan Republik Papua Barat on Improving livelihoods in remote lowland communities in PNG
- ◊ zag Puas on Rethinking Solomon Islands security
- ◊ Michael on Too little, too late? Securing PNG's 2022 national election
- ◊ Jeremie on The Solomons security shambles, and what it says about us
- ◊ Ropati Junior Mualia on Labor promises to inaugurate a new era of Pacific labour mobility
- ◊ Peter Clements on Timor-Leste politics: the old guard, the new president and the casuarina tree \(ai kaku\)

View all comments

Upcoming events

- Empowering migrants: Impacts of a migrant's amnesty on crime reports on May 17, 2022 3:00 pm
- US sins toward the developing world: how they harm them and us on May 24, 2022 10:00 am
- What has limited preferential voting changed in Papua New Guinea? on May 27, 2022 12:30 pm
- Growth, a graphic exposition on June 7, 2022 7:30 pm

Other Devpolicy sites

Creative Commons

This site on the Devpolicy Blog are licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-ShareAlike 4.0 International License unless otherwise noted.

Kylie McKenna

Kylie McKenna is the Director, Centre for Social Research, Divine Word University.

View all posts

Senala Morona

Senala Morona is a PNG Studies and International Relations student at Divine Word University.

View all posts

Cooniebhert Samgay

Cooniebhert Samgay is a PNG Studies and International Relations student at Divine Word University.

View all posts

10 Comments

Gabriel Kuman

June 26, 2021 at 6:56 am

A great article that describes how the so-called Westerners often perceived and labeled other nations with a "tag" name, and for that matter, our former colonizer always "labeled" us (PNG) a "failed state" – a tag name that often comes up from the mouths of our former colonizer when some form of disaster strikes the nation like pandemics, wars, etc. For me, it is just a colonial "tag name" used by former colonizers to make themselves feel good and superior to their former colonies just to make them feel dependent and subordinate to them so that they can continue to undermine and exploit them, as rightly stated by Morona.

Reply

Banabas Menei

June 24, 2021 at 11:36 am

Great article, I've gained some valuable insight. I think there can never be a universal definition of the topic 'failed state' as every state has their own problems. However, even if there was one, it would be much more acceptable coming from the state concerned (in this case PNG) after an evaluation of its progress towards achieving its national aims and goals. But for the sake of talking about issues in PNG, maybe the word 'problematic' can be used to set some boundaries, in a sense where PNG has problems that needs attention.

Reply

Tema ELLIOT

June 24, 2021 at 10:58 am

A great initiative to have an article on this. I couldn't agree more. I believe many Papua New Guineans are not aware of this. The notion of having to say that PNG is 'a failed state' is really disturbing for me. And having our former PM openly articulate that PNG is a failed state is more disturbing. It somewhat gives other countries the 'ok' to refer to PNG in such a manner. All the more it mind-boggling to see how other countries can really belittle others just because of superficial mentalities.

For me personally, I despise PNG being referred to as 'uncivilized' and now 'a failed state'. Both of these labels I feel are wrongfully put on PNG. There's really more to PNG you know.

Reply

Hanscar

July 6, 2021 at 10:31 am

I support your point. There's more about PNG.

Reply

Wilhemina Beki

June 24, 2021 at 8:03 am

A great blog and kudos to all the authors for bringing this subject out.

Reply

Barbara

June 23, 2021 at 9:17 pm

Great blog. Looking forward to reading more from DWU.

Reply

Bal Kama

June 23, 2021 at 1:41 pm

An important blog with noteworthy perspectives and critical thinking applied on a subject so often loosely used. Kudos to the authors and especially the student authors. Looking forward to reading more. Kylie, well done on facilitating such conversation among your students at DWU.

Reply

Hanscar Willie Sakundimi Kuariemo

June 23, 2021 at 9:54 am

Very happy for you three to point this out for the whole world to see. What's the whole cause of this? Is it jealousy because of our vast natural resources? Is it the level of knowledge, intervention, creativity or capability that we have is less compared to them? Or is it Racism? Or What is continuously suppressing us? Do we have potential? We are all humans.

Reply

Suzanne Loughlin

June 23, 2021 at 7:26 am

Thank you for this post. I agree, representations of others as a failed / failing state serves Western purposes in that it says your way of being does / count. "We" know what a state should look like and we have the expertise you need to become like us and, by the way, we have the ODA to help us shape you like us – liberal democratic and free-market oriented – in other words, like a "proper" state. On the one hand, it amazes me that this narrative is taken seriously and on the other it illustrates how power and knowledge come together to determine "truth" and what that "truth" makes possible. But the first step is to shine a light so thanks.

Reply

Kylie

June 23, 2021 at 8:30 am

Thank you, Suzanne, for your reflections.

Reply

Leave a Comment

Comment

Name *  Email *  Website

Sign me up for the fortnightly newsletter!

Replies to my comments

Notify me of followup comments via e-mail. You can also subscribe without commenting.

About

Authors
Submit a Blog
Posting a Blog
Subscribe
Support Us
Contact us

Development Policy Centre

Australian Aid Tracker
PNG Budget Database
PNG Economics Database
PNG Elections Database
PNG MP Database

Australian National University

The Devpolicy Blog is based at the Development Policy Centre, Crawford School of Public Policy, College of Asia and the Pacific, The Australian National University.