

2012 | UTS DAB Research Lab

Drawing on the seminal work of architects such as Bernard Tschumi (for example, his 1976 Screenplays and 1978 Manhattan Transcripts), it explored the ways that architectural drawing methods and processes can be used as generative tools for design. It specifically investigated the spatial insights that arise from distorted vision and altered perceptual relationships.

In 2007, Feuerman suffered from an acute, isolated stroke that temporarily affected his vision and understanding of perceptual fields. His subsequent work explores how the 'new ways of seeing' generated from this experience can be translated into modes of architectural representation such as dynamic visual surfaces and installations that challenge everyday spatial perceptions.

The small exhibition space was designed to disturb; to place participants in a world of distortions, reflections, moirés, and soundscapes. Documentation - such as collages and architectural diagrams - was extended into speculations about new spatial environments and new architectures that support and transform our understanding of the seen and unseen world.
